Tarzan

The talkie Tarzans (qv) began with Johnny Weissmuller and tailed off from there. The 1932 version more or less followed the original Edgar Rice Burroughs novel, and all the MGM entries had a special vivid quality about them, but subsequently the productions, usually produced under the aegis of Sol Lesser, tailed off towards the standard of the TV series of the sixties starring Ron Ely. In the 80s, John Derek revived the series as a vehicle for his wife, and Hugh Hudson promised to return to Burroughs's original, but merely added some intellectual pretension of his own. In 1998, Casper Van Dien tried unsuccessfully to make the role his own.

GB title: The Thing from Another World
A US scientific expedition in the Arctic is menaced by a ferocious being they inadvertently thaw out from a spaceship.
Curiously drab suspense shocker mainly set in corridors, with insufficient surprises to sustain its length. It does, however, contain the first space monster on film, and is quite nimbly made, though it fails to use the central gimmick from its original story.

'It's like a home movie in more ways than one; Phoenix looks drunk or tranquillised most of the time, and shows none of the gifts he once had to burn ... The film is quite stupendously aimless, with a lousy plot and even worse dialogue.' – Sunday Times
'Phoenix's performance is perceivably off-kilter – at best strange in a Methody mumbo-jumbo kind of way, at worst downright creepy. Camouflaged as a greasy-haired wreck with a cobra-lidded gaze, he lurches from lucidity to functionally impaired, mumbling throughout. All of this, however, is unfair baggage with which to saddle Bogdanovich's formulaic musical drama, a film which otherwise registers as a wispy but mostly enjoyable romantic fable.' – Matt Mueller, Empire
† The film was released direct to video in Britain, although it also received a brief showing at the National Film Theatre. It was River Phoenix's last film to be released, though he later made Dark Blood, which was abandoned following his death. Bogdanovich joined the film at a relatively late stage, replacing the original director.

Fragmentary bio-pic and semi-documentary on the life of the reclusive and eccentric Canadian concert pianist Glenn Gould (1932–82), who gave up live performances at the age of 32, with each section accompanied by excerpts from his recordings.

A portrait of the artist as an intellectual and as an individual determined to express himself at whatever cost to himself and others, by turns fascinating and irritating – some of the sequences stop just as they begin to become interesting. Three Comrades ★★

US 1938 98m bw
MGM (Joseph L. Mankiewicz)

In twenties Germany, three friends find life hard but derive some joy from their love for a high-spirited girl who is dying of tuberculosis.

Despairing romance becomes a sentimental tearjerker with all the stops out; immaculately produced and very appealing to the masses, but prevented by censorship from being the intended indictment of Nazi Germany. The final scene in which the two surviving comrades are joined in the churchyard by their ghostly friends still packs a wallop.

'Just what Frank Borzage is trying to prove is very difficult to fathom ... there must have been some reason for making this picture, but it certainly isn't in the name of entertainment.' – Variety

'A remarkably high combination of talents has made it all very impressive and moving – good writing, a good man at the camera, good actors, and presiding over them a good director ... such unforgettable bits as the pursuit of the boy who shot Gottfried, a glimpse from under the muffling blanket of the girl's stricken face, the startling downswoop of the camera's eye upon the girl getting up from bed to remove the burden of her illness from those who love her. These are high moments in a film full of beauty.' – National Board of Review

'A love story, beautifully told and consummately acted, but so drenched in hopelessness and heavy with the aroma of death, of wasted youth in a world of foggy shapes and nameless menaces, that its beauty and strength are often clouded and betrayed.' – Time

France/Taiwan 2005 135m
Artificial Eye/Paradis Films/Orly Films/SinoMovie (Hua-fu Chang, Wen-Ying Huang, Ching-Song Liao)

Taiwanese theatrical: Zui hao de shi guang

Three stories based on different kinds of romance from Taiwanese director Hou. Each features a couple played by the same actors, Shu Qi and Chang Chen. The first is set in 1966 (a simple boy-meets-girl tale), then 1911 (in the form of an old silent film), and finally 2005 (focussing on two narcissistic types and kinky sex).

The performances are strong, with Shu Qi particularly outstanding as each of the female characters. Hou provides plenty of intrigue but allows the narratives to ramble. The 1966 episode is the most charming and accessible, and uses the director's own memories of the era, including The Platters' record Smoke Gets In Your Eyes.

The Tiger, 'the most dangerous killer in London', falls in love with a singer.
A ponderous mid-Victorian melodrama complete with barnstorming acting, and interesting mainly as an example of an earlier form of popular entertainment faithfully translated to the screen.

Tideland ③

UK/Canada 2006 120m
Revolver/Recorded Picture/Capri Films (Jeremy Thomas, Gabriella Martinelli)
An 11-year-old girl looks after her drug-addicted parents, who both overdose, leaving her alone with her fantasies and her weird neighbours.
Uneasy, creepy and no-one's idea of likable, Tideland sees the hugely talented director Gilliam moving away from any notions of catering to a mass audience. The subject matter – a child who looks after her junkie father's drug habit then retreats into her own fantasy world – is thoroughly alienating. Visually it's stunning, but hard to recommend on any other level.

TCF/Lightstorm (James Cameron, Jon Landau)
As the Titanic sails for its date with an iceberg, an independent young woman, engaged to a bullying millionaire, and travelling first class, falls for a penniless Wisconsin boy in steerage.
Said Cameron, on accepting one of the many Golden Globe awards for the film: 'So does this prove, once and for all, that size does matter?' To which there are two answers: one supplied by dialogue from the film ('Do you know of Dr Freud? His ideas about the male preoccupation with size may be of interest to you') and the other, only if you confuse quantity with quality. The recreation of the splendour and the disaster of the Titanic is brilliant, and the direction and editing often impeccable; but the dialogue is frequently risible, and the love story banal when it does not indulge in the sort of melodramatics that went out with The Perils of Pauline, which has the effect of diminishing the many real-life tragedies that occurred. Cameron is the modern-day equivalent of the Victorian theatrical designer 'Sensation' Smith of Drury Lane: a master of spectacle, but little else.

'The regretful verdict here: Dead in the water.' – Richard Corliss, Time
'As Cameron sails his lonely craft toward greatness, he should realise he needs to bring a passenger with him. Preferably someone who can write.' – Kenneth Turan, Los Angeles Times
'Suggests the movie Cecil B. DeMille might have made in 1928 had he not been contemplating a more modern disaster flick about a giant dirigible. Not only is the dialogue as floridly stilted as the least literate silent-movie intertitles, but the correlation between the characters' personal lives and their impending doom is absolute.' – J. Hoberman, Premiere
'The daring underwater remake of Harold and Maude, in which an 18-year-old boy falls in love with an 80-year-old woman. The embryonic facial features of Leonardo DiCaprio (as well as the dialogue, direction and performances) render the love story not merely unconvincing, but almost offensive. Here is a little boy whose face screams "I have not lived", teaching Kate Winslet how to be a woman, giving her permission to play a part in her own life.' – Emma Forrest, Guardian
† The film, with its 550 computer-generated shots, was the most expensive made so far, at more than $200m, and needed to grass at least $350m to break even; Cameron forewent his salary as costs escalated, keeping only the $1.5m he received as screenwriter. It broke all box-office records around the world to become the highest-grossing film so far, taking more than $1 billion, and also equalled the record set by Ben Hur for winning the most Oscars. As a result, Cameron was reportedly to be recompensed with 10 per cent of the gross, which would amount to more than $100m.
†† Papers released by the Public Records Office in 1998 showed that third-class passengers were not locked below decks, as shown in the movie.

The Tommy Steele Story

GB 1957 82m bw
Anglo Amalgamated/Insignia (Herbert Smith)
US title: Rock around the World
Tommy Steele tells journalists how he rose from being a steward in the merchant navy to singing in a Soho coffee bar and appearing in cabaret at London's fashionable Café de Paris.
Small-scale movie cashing in on Steele's then status as Britain's first rock singer. The producers don't seem to have had much faith in the drawing power of rock: there is a steel band over the titles, a calypso-styled musical commentary to the action, jazz from Humphrey Lyttleton's Band, and skiffle from Chas McDevitt and Nancy Whiskey. It also avoids the teen rebel clichés of the genre – Steele is shown as a boy who does as his parents tell him.

'The filmmakers have steered almost exclusively toward action, at the expense of sex, humor or the sort of jet-set and gaming-room glamour often highlighted in the series.' – Todd McCarthy, Variety
† The film's production was a troubled one, owing partly to the producers agreeing to have the film ready for a December release. Brosnan rejected the script after it had been rewritten; it was then rewritten again during filming by the writer of the original script; director and scriptwriter were not talking to one another, and Brosnan and Teri Hatcher were not compatible. The lives of a former left-wing revolutionary, who is now a schoolteacher, a cop and his drug-addicted wife, and a lawyer and his suspicious wife intertwine with surprising results.
An unusual experiment: the same characters and stories appear in three contrasting films with different emphases in each. On the Run, 114m, is a deft thriller about the consequences of a terrorist escaping from prison; An Amazing Couple, 97m, is a clever farce of marital misunderstanding; After Life, *120m, is a tense drama concentrating on the effect on a cop's marriage of his wife's drug addiction. The Truman Show ★★★

US 1998 102m DeLuxe
Paramount (Scott Rudin, Andrew Niccol, Edward S. Feldman, Adam Schroeder)

A man who lives happily in an island community discovers that he is the star of an all-day TV soap opera, and that his wife, friends and neighbours are all acting their parts.

A clever (if implausible) conceit that can be taken several ways: as a satire on our all-controlling media, as a comment on television's pervasiveness, and the way everyone wants to appear on it, or as an instance of situationists' desire to disrupt the spectacle, to tear away the false tinsel of everyday life, and reveal the real tinsel beneath. Whichever way, it's a pleasure to watch.

From ape to modern space scientist, mankind has striven to reach the unattainable.

A lengthy montage of brilliant model work and obscure symbolism, this curiosity slowly gathered commercial momentum and came to be cherished by those who used it as a trip without LSD.

The Upside of Anger ★★

US/Germany 2005 116m
The Works/Media 8 Entertainment/VIP Medienfonds (Alex Gartner, Jack Binder, Sammy Lee)

A housewife whose adulterous husband disappeared three years previously is raising four daughters, drinking heavily and venting her fury on the world. She gets involved with a neighbour, a former baseball star, also drinking heavily and bored with his job as a radio host.
Joan Allen's anger in this film is a magnificent sight to behold, yet Costner's washed-up sports hero takes it calmly on the chin, setting the stage for an unlikely romance. Both actors are on top form, and this role marks a comeback for Costner, who has never before strayed so far from obvious leading man territory. A surprisingly effective story with a rueful undertow; not even a jarring plot twist in the final reel spoils the overall enjoyment. Curiously, director Binder has written himself an unattractive role as a lecherous radio producer chasing one of the teenage daughters.

Deaths and odd happenings befall the inhabitants of a Japanese town who become unhealthily obsessed by spiral shapes.

Creepy, stylised horror, filmed in sickly tones of green and red, with grotesque close-ups and exaggerated sound, reflecting the director's beginnings in music videos; a promise of a narrative at the beginning is abandoned in favour of a succession of images that illustrate nothing but themselves.

Vampyr ★★

Germany/France 1932 83m bw
Tobis Klangfilm/Carl Dreyer

US title: Castle of Doom
aka: The Strange Adventure of David Gray

A young man staying in a remote inn suspects that he is surrounded by vampires and has a dream of his own death.

Vague, misty, virtually plotless but occasionally frightening and always interesting to look at, this semi-professional film long since joined the list of minor classics for two scenes: the hero dreaming of his own death and the villain finally buried by flour in a mill.

w Christen Jul, Carl Dreyer story Carmilla by Sheridan Le Fanu d Carl Dreyer ph Rudolph Maté, Louis Née m Wolfgang Zeller

☆ Julian West, Sybille Schmitz, Maurice Schutz, Jan Hieronimko

'It makes our contemporary, explicit Draculas look like advertisements for false teeth.' – Sunday Times, 1976

'It is intensely a film of hints, of eerie non sequiturs, of barely perceivable yet striking images ... evil wafts off the screen like a smell of bad breath.' – New Statesman, 1976

'Imagine we are sitting in an ordinary room. Suddenly we are told there is a corpse behind the door. In an instant, the room is completely altered; everything in it has taken another look; the light, the atmosphere have changed, though they are physically the same. This is because we have changed, and the objects are as we perceive them. That is the effect I meant to get in my film.' – Carl Dreyer

† 'Julian West' was really Baron Nicholas de Gunsberg, who financed the project.

Countess Carody, a man-hating vampire who performs in a lesbian cabaret act in Istanbul, decides to initiate a German woman who comes to the city.

A dull and inept horror movie made worse by Franco's penchant for meaningless zooms, abrupt transitions and inappropriate soundtrack music; the pace is leaden, the cast act as though they're zombies, and the director resorts to scenes of lesbian lovemaking at frequent intervals.

Venus ★★

UK/US 2006 94m
Buena Vista/Film Four/UK Film Council/Miramax/Free Range (Kevin Loader)

Maurice and Ian, two veteran British actor friends find their cosy lives are jolted when Ian's sullen grand-niece Jessie arrives to live with him – and Maurice attempts an outrageous seduction.
A film that polarises opinion along the divide of one's reaction to the spectacle of a young woman being pawed by an elderly man. Distasteful lust on his part, or an indirect rage against the dying of the light? O'Toole's skill and charm help audiences to take the broader, less obvious view. Kureishi's script is often very funny – and bawdy – though the film's overall tone is melancholic. There's something touching about Maurice giving Jessie a crash course in culture, taking her to theatres and museums; it's a nod to his hard-earned realisation that art may just sustain her in her own later years, when more transient pleasures have passed. Phillips does sterling work as a grouchy sidekick, while O'Toole's scenes with Vanessa Redgrave, who plays his ex-wife, are acting masterclasses.

Volver • ★★★ ⑨
Spain 2006 121m
Pathé/El Deseo/Canal Plus España/Ministerio de Cultura/TVE (Esther García)
A story of three generations of Spanish woman: a dead grandmother (Maura), an impoverished Madrid mother in an unhappy marriage (Cruz) and her vulnerable teenage daughter (Cobo). It involves ghosts, a murder and a terrible family secret.
The most mature work to date from this world-class film-maker. Its title means 'return,' and Almodóvar has returned from the urban settings of his earlier films to the Spanish region where he spent his childhood: La Mancha, flat, rural and windswept, a place where superstition still abounds and belief in ghosts still flourishes. A brilliant opening tracking shot of La Mancha widows scrupulously sweeping their husbands' graves clean swiftly establishes the mood. The story feels loose and flexible, and nothing is quite what it initially seems. The film's strength lies in the brilliant performances Almodóvar teases from his largely female cast, notably Cruz as the beleaguered mother Raimunda – feisty, smart and voluptuous. It marks a return for her, too, from her wilderness years in Hollywood. Volver is a total treat: a wise, reflective, wistful story, masterfully told.

Warner Seven Arts/Associates and Aldrich (Robert Aldrich)

In middle age, a demented ex-child star lives in an old Hollywood mansion with her invalid sister, and tension leads to murder.
Famous for marking the first time Hollywood's ageing first ladies stooped to horror, and followed by Hush Hush Sweet Charlotte and the other Whatevers, this dreary looking melodrama only occasionally grabs the attention and has enough plot for about half its length. The performances, however, are striking.

In the days of Charles II, Lady Skelton befriends a highwayman and takes to crime.
The most commercially successful of the Gainsborough costume charades because of its atmosphere of gloomy sin. Dramatically turgid and surprisingly poorly acted and directed, but with good period detail. It had to be reshot for America because of the ladies' décolletage.

Wicked Stepmother

US 1989 92m DeLuxe
MGM/Larco (Robert Littman)

A wife returns from holiday with her husband to discover that in their absence her father has married a strange old woman.

In 1920, a radical young Irish doctor cancels his plans to practise medicine in London when he witnesses British troops brutalising Irish volunteers waging a guerrilla campaign. He is arrested and tortured, and later keeps fighting, although a treaty has been signed between the Irish and the British government.

A skilful account of a pivotal period in Irish history, told by a director and screenwriter who make no secret of their sympathies. It's beyond dispute that the behaviour of British troops in Ireland at this time left much to be desired, but Loach portrays the Irish volunteers as innocents in an unsullied pastoral paradise – until the troops move in, of course. Still, the film has undeniable narrative power, and Laverty makes complicated counter-arguments between the Irish rebels perfectly palatable. Beautifully shot by Barry Ackroyd, with a fine, dignified performance by Cillian Murphy as an idealist prepared to fight to the very death for his beliefs and his country.

Bitten by a wolf, a mild-mannered publishing executive who is demoted in a takeover finds that he is developing the characteristics of the animal, with keener senses but also with a tendency to grow hair and go around on all fours at the time of the full moon.

A werewolf movie for people who don't like werewolf movies: sometimes witty and clever, particularly in its scenes of office politics, but finally relying on some dated narrative devices and succumbing to all the usual clichés of the genre.

A documentary on the three-day festival ('of peace, music ... and love') that attracted an audience of around 500,000 young people.

A definitive moment of the 60s, with the mood and music brilliantly captured on film. To do it took a team of 20 cameramen, who shot 120 hours of film, as well as eight camera assistants, 20 sound-men and engineers, six still photographers and 30 production assistants.

UIP/Michael Shamberg/Stacey Sher/Moritz Borman/KERNOS (Michael Shamberg, Stacey Sher, Moritz Borman, Debra Hill)

Two New York City police officers are trapped on 9/11 under rubble when a World Trade Center tower collapses.

A film of conservative virtues that unashamedly promotes American patriotism and heroism. Yet it makes a familiar mistake; in zeroing in so claustrophobically on the plight of two men on a day when an entire metropolis suffered a body blow, it somehow reduces and trivialises the appalling trauma of 9/11. All the 'action' is below ground in the rubble, while in real life a city above was being torn apart. Cage's customary self-importance as an actor does the film no favours. And a coda with a zealous Marine leading the rescue mission before going on to tours of duty in Iraq seems needlessly provocative and ill-judged.

Samuel Goldwyn

The daughter of an unhappy middle-class Yorkshire family falls passionately in love with a gypsy who has been brought up with her.

Despite American script and settings, this wildly romantic film makes a pretty fair stab at capturing the power of at least the first half of a classic Victorian novel, and in all respects it's a superb Hollywood production of its day and a typical one, complete with ghostly finale and a first-rate cast.

CATHY (MERLE OBERON): 'I don't think I belong in heaven, Ellen. I dreamt once I was there. I dreamt I went to heaven and that heaven didn't seem to be my home and I broke my heart with weeping to come back to earth and the angels were so angry they flung me out in the middle of the heath on top of Wuthering Heights and I woke up sobbing with joy.'

HEATHCLIFF (LAURENCE OLIVIER): 'What do they know of heaven or hell, Cathy, who know nothing of life? Oh, they're praying for you, Cathy. I'll pray one prayer with them. I'll repeat till my tongue stiffens: Catherine Earnshaw, may you not rest while I live on. I killed you. Haunt me, then! Haunt your murderer! I know that ghosts have wandered on the earth. Be with me always – take any form – drive me mad! Only do not leave me in this dark alone where I cannot find you. I cannot live without my life! I cannot die without my soul...'

The life of Wyatt Earp, from his youth to his later life as horse thief, buffalo hunter and successful lawman.
Over-solemn retelling of a story familiar from many other Westerns, though never before at this length or detail. Moments of tedium are inevitable, and after a revisionist beginning the film finally settles for a celebration of a mythic hero, with Costner playing Wyatt Earp as a legend rather than a flesh-and-blood person; but it often works on an epic scale.

Zatoichi

Zatoichi, the blind masseur, gambler, outlaw and expert swordsman, had long been popular in Japan, resulting in not only many films but also a television series that ran for 5 years from 1974. Takeshi Kitano's Zatoichi in 2003 revived interest in the earlier films which all starred the engaging Shitaro Katsu.

They are now beginning to be released on video and DVD in the West.

Zatoichi ★★

Japan 2003 115m colour
Artificial Eye/Bandai Visual/Tokyo FM/Dentsu/TV Asahi/Saito/Office Kitano (Masayuki Mori, Tsunehisa Saito)

A blind masseur and swordsman helps two geishas, one of whom is a man, to revenge the death of their parents by gangsters.
Reviving one of Japanese cinema's favourite, long-running heroes, Takeshi Kitano makes a less effective Zatoichi than Shintaro Katsu, but is a better director than his predecessors. He takes the elements of the original movies – peasants moving in rhythmic ways, gender confusion, bloody sword fights – and exaggerates them for deft, comic effect.

In San Francisco, a serial killer called Zodiac eludes capture by the authorities in an unsolved case spanning more than two decades. A newspaper cartoonist, Robert Graysmith, becomes obsessed with the case and carries out his own inquiries.

This model of a sleek, well-crafted film is undermined by its grotesquely long running time, and its inconclusive ending raises the question of whether the lengthy ride was worthwhile. Gyllenhaal is a faintly passive central character, so any fun is around the edges – in the opening murder scene, which is genuinely spooky, and in the fleet-footed performances by Robert Downey Jr. as a cynical reporter with beatnik mannerisms, and Elias Koteas as a hard-working suburban detective. By the end you feel more immersed in all the theories about Zodiac's identity than you ever wished to be.

Zoolander

US 2001 89m DeLuxe Panavision
Paramount/Village Roadshow/VH1/NPV (Scott Rudin, Ben Stiller, Stuart Cornfeld)

A dim-witted fashion model is brainwashed by a gang of designers to kill the Prime Minister of Malaysia.

Energetic farce that aims to be a satire on pop culture, but is too toothless for the task.

w Drake Sather, Ben Stiller, John Hamburg d Ben Stiller ph Barry Peterson m David Arnold pd Robin Standefer ed Greg Hayden cos David C. Robinson

'Gleefully goofy and consistently funny.' – Claudia Puig, USA Today

'A freakishly potent farce – stuffed with throwaway non sequiturs, fueled by absurdist counterintuition, premised on fearless repetition.' – Dennis Lim, Village Voice

'They're going to save the world...as long as they're home for dinner'

Zoom

US 2006 83m
Sony/Revolution Studios/ Team Todd, Underground Films (Todd Garner, Jennifer Todd, Suzanne Todd)

A washed-up superhero trains gifted youngsters to battle an evil nemesis.

A badly acted, mirthless comic strip reliant on juvenile gags for its embarrassing laughs.

Zorba the Greek ★★

GB 1964 142m bw
TCF/Rockley/Cacoyannis (Michael Cacoyannis)

A young English writer in Crete is befriended by a huge gregarious Greek who comes to dominate his life.
A mainly enjoyable character study of a larger-than-life character, this film made famous by its music does not really hang together dramatically and has several melodramatic excrescences.
wd Michael Cacoyannis novel Nikos Kazantzakis ph Walter Lassally m Mikis Theodorakis ad Vasseli Fotopoulos ed Alex Archamboult, Michael Cacoyannis
☆ Anthony Quinn (Alexis Zorba), Alan Bates (Basil), Lila Kedrova (Mme Hortense), Irene Papas (The Widow), George Foundas (Mavrandoni), Eleni Anousaki (Lola)

'For all its immense length, the film never gets down to a clear statement of its theme, or comes within measuring distance of its vast pretensions.' – Brenda Davies

† Lila Kedrova replaced Simone Signoret after a week's filming, as Signoret was unable to portray a weak woman.

Zorro (dubbed)

Italy/France 1975 100m colour
Mondial/Artistes Associés (Vittorio Galiano)

After his friend is assassinated, Zorro takes his place as governor of a Spanish colony where a corrupt colonel and his friends are terrorizing and exploiting the locals.
Swashbuckling, tongue-in-cheek adventure done with some style and very little bloodshed.
w Giorgio Arlorio d Duccio Tessari ph Giulio Albonico m Guido and Maurizio de Angelis ad Enzo Bulgarelli ed Mario Morra

'Zany! Zexy! Zensational!'

Zorro the Gay Blade

US 1981 93m DeLuxe
Melvin Simon (George Hamilton, C. O. Erickson)

Zorro, the masked avenger, not only pretends to be a fop but is one. Luckily he has a twin brother.

Abysmal attempt to do for Zorro what Love at First Bite did for Dracula.
